INTERFACING THE STEREODRIVER WITH COMPUTERS

The RCA input to the StereoDriver will accept 60Hz synch with or without standard NTSC or RS 170A odd-even fields. However, if the video lacks the proper odd-even field identification, the system will boot up at random and the right eye will get the left eye image 50% of the time(unless custom software is written). The model 2001 StereoDriver has no video loopthrough, but one video output can be split into three with a $25 video amp from Radio Shack. In emergencies, the video can be T'd, but this can cause loss of sync. The model 1000P StereoDriver has video loopthrough and a switch for reversing right-left polarity of the Visors. The StereoDriver may follow other frequencies in the range 50 to 100 Hz with sync delivered through the RCA jack. If this fails, the Driver can be opened and driven internally with TTL logic. We can perform this on a custom basis or supply customers with schematics. With RGB systems, sync is usually separate or on the green and feeding this to the RCA jack should work. As frequencies near 100 Hz, the images seen through the StereoVisors get dimmer. This can be alleviated by removing the black plastic covering the front of the Visors. All three types of Visors(eyeglass, headband and panoramic) will work with the StereoDriver and up to 8 pairs can be connected with standard stereo headphone splitters.
